Checking Your Credit Report for Errors

Checking your report gives you the chance to correct inaccurate or incomplete information that can negatively impact your credit score. It can also alert you to signs of identity theft, such as fraudulent accounts opened in your name. If you discover an error, file a dispute with the credit bureau either online or by calling the phone number listed on the report. You can also write to them at the addresses below. The bureau has 30 days to investigate and must delete the item if the lender doesn't respond in that time. If the credit grantor insists the information is accurate, you're entitled to have your explanation added to your report.
